Because there is a small but significant risk of patients developing a potentially fatal blood disorder on either of the medications, all patients have to be regularly monitored. The scheme that Novartis has in place for monitoring its safety has proved itself for more than 10 years. Henry Arnold, chairman of Denfleat, said that the hostility shown by Novartis was extraordinary. Clozapine is usually given after other drugs have failed to control what is known as treatment-resistant schizophrenia, which affects around 30 per cent of patients. The Office of Fair Trading has now decided to investigate whether there has been a breach of the Competitions Act. He said that for the Maudsley the price differential between the drugs was greatly reduced, because Novartis discounted the price of its drug. There's been suggestions that safety might be compromised. Novartis also helps to fund a number of charities, including Rethink, one of the leading mental health voluntary organisations in Britain. But Novartis is an enormous company, and they can see their profits disappearing now they've got competition. But those at the sharp end of the battle are the hospital pharmacists who have to make the decision about whether to switch over to a different brand of drug. That is not to say that others do not have sufficient expertise and track record to do the same. They can include hallucinations, delusions and apathy or withdrawal from society. Clozapine was invented back in the Seventies but had to be taken off the market 10 years ago because of some fatalities. Two pamphlets produced by Swiss-based Novartis have had to be withdrawn, and the Medicines Healthcare Regulatory Agency has upheld two complaints about the company. The National Institute for Clinical Excellence Nice issued guidance on atypical antipsychotic drugs two years ago, and estimated that, although 13, patients were already on clozapine, there were potentially another 24, patients who would be eligible for it. Rethink has been unwilling to give its wholehearted support to the new drug until it is satisfied about its efficacy. It is engaged in a fierce battle over the marketing and the safety claims of the new medication. We have nothing to hide and have complied fully with all the regulations. Lee Wells, of Novartis, said that it was prepared to fully co-operate with the investigation. Clozapine, sold under the brand name Clozaril among others, is an atypical antipsychotic medication. It is mainly used for schizophrenia that does not improve following the use of other antipsychotic medications. In those with schizophrenia and schizoaffective disorder it may decrease the rate of suicidal behavior. It is more Drug class?: ?atypical antipsychotic.
